

Everything is out of the ordinary:

- Seeing an older gentleman standing by the clocktower trying to convince students that the earth is flat.
- Professors being lost in time, running late to class or staying over the designated time.
- Meeting all these people and everything being new. I'm realizing this isn't my hometown anymore.

People aren't social enough

- Watching as everyone walks around campus glued to their screens in total silence, creating this digital barrier.
- People seem to already have friend groups figured out. There isn't room for me where they fit and friends aren't sticking.

Nostalgia and the emotional rollercoaster:

- Out of Season Comfort where I'm getting homemade holiday cookies from my mom in September. I feel happy as it brings me comfort, but also feels weird and out of place.
- I'm experiencing this big emotional shift where I feel homesick, but then happy to be here. Sharing these family cookies with new people feels strange.
- Nostalgia is hitting me in ways it never has before. I'm getting transported sometimes to things like childhood Halloween parties or old family vacations.

Everything is out of the ordinary:

- Seeing an older gentleman standing by the clocktower trying to convince students that the earth is flat.
- Professors being lost in time, running late to class or starting over the designated time.
- Meeting all these people and everything being new. I'm realizing this isn't my hometown anymore.

People aren't social enough:

- Watching as everyone walks around campus glued to their screens in total silence, creating this digital barrier.
- People seem to already have friend groups figured out. There isn't room for me where they fit and friends aren't sticking.

Nostalgia and the emotional rollercoaster:

- Out of season comfort where I'm getting holiday cookies from my mom in September. I feel happy as it brings me comfort, but also feels weird and out of place.
- I'm experiencing this big emotional shift where I feel homesick, but then happy to be here. Sharing these family cookies with new people feels strange.
- Nostalgia is hitting me in ways it never has before. I'm getting transported sometimes to things like childhood Halloween parties or old family vacations.

Question #1:

↓
How does sensory nostalgia distort our sense of time and space during times like this and why is it so strong?

Phenomenon Draft:

- The disorienting tension of modern college life where new daily routines, digital isolation, and intense emotional nostalgia collide.

Question #2: Why do things need to feel so out of the ordinary, and is relying so heavily on phones partially to distract us from this?

Everything is out of the ordinary:

- Seeing an older gentelman standing by the clocktower trying to convince students that the earth is flat.

- Professors being lost in time, running late to class or staying over the designated time.

- Meeting all these people and everything being new. I'm realizing this isn't my hometown anymore.

Lens #2:

Fortnite and digital nostalgia:

- Fortnite to me and many others creates this virtual space full of culture that holds so much nostalgia to be looked into. Other popular games do this as well.

People aren't social enough:

- Watching as everyone walks around campus glued to their screens in total silence, creating this digital barrier.

- People seem to already have friend groups figured out. There isn't room for me where they fit and friends aren't sticking.

Nostalgia and the emotional rollercoaster:

- Out of season comfort where I'm getting holiday cookies from my mom in September. I feel happy as it brings me comfort, but also feels weird and out of place.

- I'm experiencing this big emotional shift where I feel homesick, but then happy to be here. Sharing these family cookies with new people feels strange.

- Nostalgia is hitting me in ways it never has before. I'm getting transported sometimes to things like childhood Halloween parties or old family vacations.

Phenomenon Draft:

- The disorienting tension of modern college life where new daily routines, digital isolation, and intense emotional nostalgia collide.

Lens #1:

Spike Lee's Do the Right Thing movie:

- I just recently watched this for my film class and the movie explores public behavior. Could relate to a lot of social tension and examples on campus.

Question #1:

↓
How does sensory nostalgia distort our sense of time and space during times like this and what is it so strong?

Question #2: Why do things need to feel so out of the ordinary, and is relying so heavily on phones partially to distract us from this?